Remarks from Jan Leach, APS President: Jan gave an update on the strategic plan of APS. In a diverse global community of scientists, APS wants to increase access of readership to its journals using Atypion. She noted that publications were becoming more global in outlook. Plant Management Network is expanding, dealing with topics such as turf and emerging diseases. They are contemplating a journal of tropical agriculture. APS wants enhanced collaborations with other societies. APS wants an expanded vision for international activities and collaborations to advance the science. She talked about the Meeting of the Americas in 2009. She said the challenge to the Office of Electronic Communications is to identify where information dissemination will be in five and ten years. She mentioned that there was an ad hoc committee on the future education of plant pathologists. This committee is charged to assess the existing ability to educate students and it will provide recommendations. Another ad hoc committee will assess the profession of plant pathology, particularly, assess the status of plant pathologists now, then develop a plan of action for the future. Other committees are looking at the future status of culture collections and the under-representation of women in plant sciences. The theme for the upcoming meeting in San Diego is “Strength Through Diversity”.
